LETTER FROM THE TRANSLATOR TO THE POET.

My dear Maestro,

As I put down the pen, which has just traced the last lines of the translation of your Othello, my feelings towards you are not altogether of an amicable kind. You had set me a task which, if interesting in one way, was on the other hand one of the most difficult I had ever undertaken, and now that I have finished that task, I apprehend, that it is not likely to please anybody, least of all myself. You had placed me, as we say in familiar phrase, between the devil and the deep sea; while following your work from line to line, from word to word, I had on one side of me the ocean depths of Shakespeare's thought and tragic passion, and on the other hand the sonorous beauty of the lingua di si, as wielded by your hand and wedded to Verdi's strains; the devil having after his wont chosen the most attractive form of disguise. How to shape my course between these two formidable difficulties was what puzzled my poor brain for many anxious days, and nights as well, knowing as I did that failure in this case would be commensurate with the length of life which Verdi's and your genius secured for this musical Othello in the country of Shakespeare. As to the result of my labour, others must judge and probably will judge not in the most friendly spirit; for those who know Shakespeare without knowing music will say that I have taken all manner of liberties with the sacred original; and those who know music without knowing Shakespeare will be staggered at a style of diction so entirely different from that of the ordinary libretto. The only person whom I have a faint hope, and at the same time the greatest desire to satisfy, is yourself; and by entertaining that hope I at the same time pay you a great compliment, or rather I should say, express that profound esteem in which I hold you and your devotion to, and, where necessary, self-abnegation in, the cause of all that is highest and purest in art. That devotion you have shown in many fields and on many occasions. The masterpieces of various languages are familiar to you. Goethe's great poem has found in you the most and, omitting the finale of Schumann's Faust, I might almost say, the only congenial interpreter. Hero and Leander, two of the sweetest creations of antique myth, have excited your poetic, I wish that I could add, your musical genius; and we are all anxiously expecting your embodiment of that lurid but essentially dramatic nightmare of Roman history — Nero. To hear a good singer declaim the words "quantus artifex pereo" to your music will alone be a treat that may console one for many platitudes of modern opera. To the work of our own Shakespeare, also, you are not a stranger. Hamlet and Othello have passed through the alembic of your imagination and have come forth from it dramatic poems, not mere librettos. A man of your stamp — to return once more to the aforesaid compliment — will understand and perhaps appreciate my motive, when I say that I have to some extent sacrificed your poetry to that of your great original. What I mean is this: Knowing that it was your intention to reproduce the spirit of Shakespeare as far as the divergent genius of the two idioms and the two nations would allow, I have restored the words of Shakespeare even where you, for good and sufficient reasons, had somewhat modified their purport. Let me give you an instance. In the third act, where Othello asks for the loan of Desdemona's handkerchief on the pretence of suffering from "a salt and sorry rheum," your keen southern susceptibility was perhaps a little shocked by this touch of realism: and you place the seat of the pretended illness for the second time in the forehead instead of in the nose. Here I have unhesitatingly restored the cold for the head-ache. Again, you have moved some of the dramatis personae one step upwards in the scale of military rank. Cassio with you is a captain, and Iago a lieutenant. Here also I have ruthlessly cancelled their promotion. Cassio as in Shakespeare is the lieutenant, and Iago, God bless the mark!, his moorship's ancient. These are small matters, but they are cited here in illustration of my method of restoring Shakespeare's text when retransferring his ideas to Shakespeare's tongue. That I was able to do this in so many cases, that so many of Shakespeare's salient words appear in my libretto, is at the same time the best proof of the care and reverence with which you have treated Othello. I could cite such lines as "Think'st thou I'ld make a life of jealously," "The fountain from the which my current runs, or else dries up," almost the entire plea of Othello before the senate, which (as the first act of the play had to be sacrificed) you have ingeniously used in your love duet; and innumerable others.

In the matter of form I have carried out a similar process of restoration. In the dialogue I have discarded the rhyme altogether, and have returned to blank verse, the recognised medium of the English poetic drama. Only in the lyrical pieces and in the ensembles where Shakespeare is altogether out of the question, and where your diction occasionally and faintly suggests the libretto proper, I have used such rhymes as readily suggested themselves.

My remarks hitherto refer to the poem in its separate condition. When it came to adapting that poem to the music another consideration even more powerful than reverence for Shakespeare asserted itself. The finest poetry in the world would in opera be valueless if it did not fit the music, it it could not be sung; and if this applies to the work of other composers, how much more so to this Othello in which Verdi has adhered to dramatic and declamatory truth with a consistency and a beautiful, I might almost say pathetic self-abnegation, worthy of so great a master. To make the metrical accent coincide in every instance with the musical accent, to alter the phrasing as little as possible, to give to each important word and thought the musical emphasis intended by the composer, has been my earnest endeavour; and, in these respects at least, I am prepared to challenge the most-searching investigation of intelligent critics.

To the same supreme duty even the language and the metre of Shakespeare had to yield. If rather than destroy the balance of the cantilena I had to stretch the line already quoted "The fountain from the which my current runs" on a Procrustean bed, and let it take the form of "The crystal fountain from the which my current ever runs," I inserted those two meaningless words with a pang; but I did insert them.

But I must conclude, having, I fear, claimed too much of your attention already. Let me finally assure you that the trouble and anxiety, which this translation has cost me, are more than amply repaid by the consciousness of being connected in ever so humble a way, with a work which, in my opinion, marks an epoch in the development of Italian opera — shewing, as it does, that the feeling for truth and beauty, the two vital components of all art, is still alive in the land of song.

Believe me,

your sincere and admiring friend,

LONDON, July, 1887. FRANCIS HUEFFER.

(Si vede ricomparire Desdemona nel giardino, dalla vasta apertura del fondo; essa è circondata da donne dell'isola, da fanciulli, da marinai ciprioti e albanesi, che si avanzano e le offrono fiori e rami fioriti ed altri doni. Alcuni s'accompagnano, cantando, sulla guzla (una specie di mandòla), altri hanno delle piccole arpe ad armacollo.)

(Desdemona is seen to return to the garden through the large opening at the back; she is surrounded by women, children, and Cypriot and Albanian sailors, who come forward in turn offering her flowers and other gifts. They sing, accompanying themselves, some on the guzla a kind of mandoline and others on small harps.)

(Finito il Coro, Desdemona bacia la testa d'alcuni tra i fanciulli, e alcune donne le baciano il lembo della veste, ed essa porge una borsa ai marinai. Il Coro s'allontana. Desdemona, seguita poi da Emilia, entra nella sala e s'avanza verso Otello.)

(When the singing is over Desdemona kisses some of the children, some of the women kiss the hem of her gown. She gives a purse to the sailors. Exit Chorus slowly. Desdemona followed by Emilia comes forward into the hall where Othello stands.)

Act III.

La gran sala del Castello.
The great Hall of the Castle.

A destra un vasto peristilio a colonne. Questo peristilio è annesso ad una sala di minori proporzioni: nel fondo un verone.

To the left a large portico which leads to another smaller room; at the back a terrace.
